Watch for Common Issues

Fall is the time to closely watch for looming problems with your vehicle, since they can become so much worse with colder weather.

In some cases, routine maintenance will uncover small problems before they become big ones – but it's always smart to keep an eye out for common issues in between service visits. Here's what to look for:

WARNING LIGHTS

Vehicles now come standard with a variety of lights in the dashboard to provide warnings about issues throughout the system. The lights illuminate when a sensor in the engine control unit or computer detects an issue. Consult your owner's manual to become familiar with what these lights indicate. If your car or truck is still under warranty, you'll have to take it to the dealer so a licensed employee can make repairs. Otherwise, find a trusted mechanic to get things back on track.

POOR MILEAGE

Poor fuel mileage is typically caused by worn-out or dirty components like filters or sensors. Problems within this system create a situation where more fuel is needed to run the engine at required speeds. To prevent or correct these issues, take your car or truck in for regular servicing and maintenance.

ENGINE SPUTTERING

If your engine is sputtering, there is a problem with the vehicle's complex system of ignition or fuel components. They work together to power your car or truck. Fixing this may be as simple as bringing in the vehicle for maintenance. Otherwise, component replacement may be required. Always follow the manufacturer's recommendations.

TROUBLE STARTING

There may be problems with your starter motor or the battery. A vehicle's starter gets the engine going so that you can drive. Failure of this component is often due to damage to the starter motor, electrical solenoid or other electrical faults that may arise. See your dealer or trusted mechanic to make repairs.

More often, the issue is a dying or dead battery. Experts suggest replacing a vehicle's battery every three years or 50,000 miles, whichever comes first. This is recommended whether the battery shows signs of slowing down or not, to avoid an unsuspected breakdown. Other potential culprits if your car or truck won't start include a damaged battery temperature sensor or alternator.
